

International Relations and European Politics (IREP)

International Relations and European Politics (IREP) is an undergraduate study programme taught by internationally experienced lecturers in a single-subject full-time form and based on the ECTS credit system.

The language of instruction is English. In its compulsory courses, the IREP programme reflects the diversity of international relations as an academic discipline (see the course list below). With its wide selection of optional courses, students can specialise in their fields of interest.

IREP graduates can find employment in a number of professions, particularly large companies, international organisations, think-tanks, in state administration and diplomatic services, as well as in political party structures and journalism.

Graduates are also well prepared to continue with studies in English-language graduate programmes, such as European Politics, European Governance, and Energy Security Studies at the Faculty of Social Studies, or at any other graduate programme in the world.

Compulsory courses comprise Introduction to IR and EP; History of International Relations and World Politics; Academic Skills; Contemporary History of Europe; European Integration; Global Politics: Current Issues; International Security; Human Rights, Democratization and Global Justice; Introduction to Energy Security: Related Concepts; Theory of International Relations and European Integration; Research Methods and Tools; International Organizations and Diplomacy; Economic Dimensions of International Relations: An Introduction; Institutions of the EU; Diploma Seminar I; and Diploma Seminar II.

<http://mve.fss.muni.cz/en/bc/irep>

International Relations and European Politics (IREP)

International Relations and European Politics (IREP) is an undergraduate study programme taught by internationally experienced lecturers in a single-subject full-time form and based on the ECTS credit system.

The language of instruction is English. In its compulsory courses, the IREP programme reflects the diversity of international relations as an academic discipline (see the course list below). With its wide selection of optional courses, students can specialise in their fields of interest.

IREP graduates can find employment in a number of professions, particularly large companies, international organisations, think-tanks, in state administration and diplomatic services, as well as in political party structures and journalism.

Graduates are also well prepared to continue with studies in English-language graduate programmes, such as European Politics, European Governance, and Energy Security Studies at the Faculty of Social Studies, or at any other graduate programme in the world.

Compulsory courses comprise Introduction to IR and EP; History of International Relations and World Politics; Academic Skills; Contemporary History of Europe; European Integration; Global Politics: Current Issues; International Security; Human Rights, Democratization and Global Justice; Introduction to Energy Security: Related Concepts; Theory of International Relations and European Integration; Research Methods and Tools; International Organizations and Diplomacy; Economic Dimensions of International Relations: An Introduction; Institutions of the EU; Diploma Seminar I; and Diploma Seminar II.

<http://mve.fss.muni.cz/en/bc/irep>